Paradiplomacy and Regional Development

Local self-governments do not run independent foreign policies as they do not possess such authorizations from the central government. As a result, their goals, strategies and forms of international activity have to be consistent with the foreign policy of the central government and the country. However, nowadays the local self-governments are exceptionally active actors in the field of public diplomacy, especially in its network model. This in fact strengthens their significance in the international relations milieu, which is growing rapidly, especially in the European Union.
